

Chess

T.S

Lisa opened her eyes, disorientated. Everything around her was shrouded in darkness. Where was she?

She looked down at the ground, it was marble white, the sides edging into obsidian black. Standing on either side of Lisa were two people, each spaced at least five metres away.

“Where are we?” She yelled at the man to her right.

“I don’t ... arghhh!” He was whisked away into the darkness.

“Please, please,” the lady on the side started crying.

“It’ll be ok, it’ll ...” Lisa screamed when something grabbed her. Two huge black appendages squeezed her face and shoulder as she was lifted in the air; crushing force that made her eyeball feel like it would pop out of its socket.

Suddenly, she was on the ground again, this time on the black obsidian. A snort made her look up.

About fifteen metres away was a huge battle horse on the marble white, its snout locked behind a metal mask. It was staring directly at her, hoof prancing over the ground in anticipation.

A man was on top of the beast.

Lisa held up her hands.

“Please, I don’t want any trouble.” She took a step back and snapped her head down to look, her feet wouldn’t move.

“Neither do I,” the man moaned, as the horse shrieked and began charging forward.

“NO, please, NOOO,” her wails were cut short when the beast’s chest slammed her to floor, and a hoof stomped down on her face.